The Six Fundamental Axioms:

- (1) A human being is incapable of making statements or propositions about reality because he is inherently an irrational creature.
- (2) When one reads Axiom 1, this may cause that person to desire to kill, mute, block, incarcerate, insult, or reeducate the author of these axioms because that person is likely offended or may feel that that person's story or ego has been challenged, which may trigger that person's innate primal fight-or-flight instinctive responses.
- (3) Axiom 1 cannot be false because axioms are a priori presumed true for attempts at rational dialogue.
- (4) Rational dialogue is impossible because of Axiom 1.
- (5) The occurrence of dialogue is a natural outcome of the chaotic universe.
- (6) Attempts at the impossible are one of the random outcomes of a chaotic world.

In conclusion, one is effectively an automatic and deterministic machine who does not have free will, who does not have the ability to differentiate A from B, nor has control over or could succeed in the environment, outside of the graces of randomness. This thesis and its antithesis—which might argue that humans are in fact rational creatures—both rely on faith and have paradoxes, making both or neither true—and neither offers a tool of measurement to settle the ideological confliction between the two.
